I love the FCC and what it stands for, and would be honored and excited to make a bigger contribution.

The FCC has an important role to play as we defend press freedom amid a changing social and political environment, and I'd like to contribute to that discourse. I'm a huge fan of our events and talks, and would love to help shape our agenda. I'm also committed to helping shore up new recruits; while strengthening ties between all our esteemed journalist, correspondent, diplomatic and associate members, who collectively make our club so great.

As a proud member of the FCC, I pledge my energy and enthusiasm to you all, and to listen and come up with new ideas to continue being the best club we can.

Natasha Khan is a reporter with Bloomberg News. She follows the health-care story in China, and how it intersects with economic, social and political developments in the world’s most populous country. She was also a core reporter on the Bloomberg News team that produced “Revolution to Riches” in 2012: an award-winning series that uncovered the financial holdings of China’s ruling class.

Khan holds bachelor’s degrees in law and business administration from the University of Hong Kong, as well as a master’s degree in journalism from the Journalism and Media Studies Centre at HKU. Before Bloomberg, she covered deals for mergermarket (then a part of Pearson’s Financial Times Group), and was a volunteer legal adviser to asylum seekers in the Chinese territory. She has lived briefly in Beijing and Antalya, Turkey.
