Karly COX

Affiliation: Tatler Asia

I am a long-time FCC member, having joined the Club as “young journalist” member around 2007 in the early days of my time at SCMP.

I worked on the Post’s student publication for nearly 15 years, focusing largely on news and news in education, and doing a lot of mentoring: of younger staff reporters – often fresh university graduates; of our readers via our content; and of our junior reporters, members of a club of aspiring journalists in their teens (including one of the inaugural Clare Hollingworth fellows, Jessie Pang). My current role as Regional Managing Editor at Tatler Asia also enables me to work with young writers and editors.

The move to Tatler came about after a change in content direction change a few years before I joined means it is no longer a tai-tai-tastic compendium, but a publication containing stories that matter. I care deeply about such stories being heard, and ergo the work done by journalists. I am passionate about supporting young people in the industry; on the board, I would be keen to support initiatives that bring in and train the next generation of journalists and club members.

Journalism in its many forms matters. In these confusing times, I am proud to belong to a club that is continuing to champion the vital role played by journalists in holding the powerful to account, and discovering and sharing stories. In standing for the board, I hope to collaborate on attracting more young journalists and supporting them on their career journeys so they feel supported in their crucial work. I would also want to play a part in the stewardship of the club, contributing to its ongoing success and import, and guaranteeing this support network and bank of resources is available to these young journalists for as long as possible.
